Notes:

The two main sources of legislation that affect general records retention are:

1. The Limitation Act 1980 sets out the times after which claims against the College will be extinguished. For most transactions the time limit is 6 years, except for some contracts and property transactions, personal injury claims and defamation.
2. The time limit for personal injury claims is 3 years from the time of the incident, except when the damage (for example from exposure to asbestos) does not become known until later. Thus the time limit for health surveillance records is much longer. For minors, the time limit does not start to run until they are 18.
<http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1980/58>
3. The Data Protection Act 1998 (Principle 5) requires the College to retain personal data for as long as is necessary for the purposes that it was collected but no longer. What is “necessary” is defined as the period required to protect the College’s interests, which is usually related to the Limitation Act 1980
4. Where there is a duty to keep a record and no specific and clear retention period in legislation a limit has been set according to the purpose that the record is kept for. The specific legislation involved is listed in the footnotes to this document
